Nirvana.

Where the Buddha sleeps and dreams
All that is and all that seems;
All that can curse or bless,
Here is true forgetfulness.

Where the lotus blossoms throw
Scents as soft as driven snow;
And, like driven snow, they cover
Hate and hatred, love and lover.

Where the Buddha sits and smiles
Is the end of all the miles;
At the great eternal goal
You may find or lose your soul.

Joys that please, and griefs that mar,
Things that are not and that are,
All are shadowed images
Which the Buddha dreams he sees.

There is neither I nor you,
There is neither false nor true,
There is neither "Yes" nor "No."

All in Buddha come and go.

And the God himself, has He
Surer claims to dream or be?
Or is He himself a dream,
Chief of all the things that seem?
